

“Along the Watchtower”

This piece pulses like an echo from Jimi Hendrix’s rendition of “All Along the Watchtower”—a world suspended between warning and awakening.

A fractured landscape unfolds like a dream on the edge of revelation.

Figures drift between fire and transcendence, between control and liberation. The Olympic rings, the crumbling of ancient monuments, the guarded gates, and the winding path upward, all mirror the tension Hendrix channeled— “there must be some kind of way out of here.” Here, that “way out” takes form as Bitcoin.

The faint words “Satoshi was here” echo like a whisper from an unseen architect, positioning Bitcoin less as a product and more as a philosophical intervention—an idea planted in the collective psyche.

Meanwhile, the glowing portal at the center, framing a serene, almost divine feminine figure, introduces a moment of transcendence: a possible rebirth, or an alternative system of value rooted not in domination but in harmony.

This piece is not just seen—it’s wandered through. It hums with urgency like Hendrix’s guitar, bending reality into something electric and unstable, while asking the viewer:

Are you the thief, the joker, or the one climbing the path beyond the watchtower?

BITCOIN REVOLUTION

“The Greatest War”

This piece stages a distinctly American mythology—part patriotism, part critique—through a stylized, almost pop-propaganda delivery.

At its center, a saluting blonde figure evokes mid-century Americana: Rosie the Riveter, wartime pin-ups, and the polished optimism of postwar identity. Yet here, that iconography is recontextualized. She doesn’t salute a flag or a state—she salutes an idea: “FREEDOM MONEY.”

Below and around her, the imagery shifts from nation-state to network. Hearts labeled “Bitcoin” float like countercultural emblems—part love, part rebellion. Winged airmen clutch them like offerings or escape devices, suggesting liberation from enforced insanity—economic, political, and institutional.

The owl perched on her arm introduces another layer: wisdom, watchfulness, perhaps even a warning. It contrasts with the spectacle above, suggesting a quieter, more enduring form of knowledge beneath the noise of power.

It asks whether the American promise of freedom has been co-opted by centralized control—and whether new tools, like Bitcoin, represent a return to its original spirit or a departure from it entirely.

FREEDOM

MONEY

“Peer To Peer Ethos”

A radiant coin burns like a small sun in the void, its orbit traced by a sacred refrain—mending the hoop of the people, peer to peer. Around it, the words move in a circle, like a ritual of return, mending what was once torn.

Beneath, the language descends like scripture half-remembered: of flesh as thread, of humanity as a single living tapestry, of a pulse rediscovered between distant hearts. The old walls—silent, towering, imposed—begin to soften, as if they were never stone at all, but shadows waiting for light.

Bitcoin isn't just "digital gold"—it is a living protocol that realigns humanity's economic and social structures away from centralized distortions and into alignment with something truer.

Flesh is woven by the thread of God; disconnect one part, and the whole suffers.

Bitcoin weaves individuals into a living network— peer to peer, pulse to pulse—dissolving the hardened walls of banks, governments, and intermediaries.
It invites a return to trust: human meeting human, without veil or gate.

Isolation ends; sovereignty begins; wholeness emerges and begins to breathe.

Structural Integration reveals what the body has always known:
that alignment is not imposed, but uncovered—
that the body, once brought into right relationship, remembers how to heal.

Bitcoin echoes this truth in the social body: when money aligns with truth, distortion falls away, and something coherent begins to emerge.

This is not theory—it is felt, embodied, and alive.
Wholeness isn't abstract; it's structural, sovereign, and revolutionary.

Artist Bio

I create under the name Lady Nakamoto— a philosophical stance against the invisible architectures of power that shape modern life. My work exists at the convergence of politics, philosophy, and culture, where systems of belief are not only governed, but performed, inherited, and remixed.

I explore the political reality that institutions—monetary, governmental, and cultural—are sustained less by necessity than by collective agreement. Culture, in this sense, becomes the carrier of power: transmitting values, normalizing hierarchies, and shaping what people accept as truth. My work interrogates these inherited narratives, asking not only who controls systems, but how those systems become embedded in identity, art, and everyday life.

Bitcoin, within my practice, is not merely a technological innovation but a cultural and philosophical rupture. It represents a shift from authority-based truth to verifiable truth, from centralized storytelling to decentralized consensus. It challenges the idea that value must be defined by institutions, instead allowing culture itself—peer to peer—to participate in the creation and exchange of meaning.

I work in the medium of hand generated digital art. Using a digital communications platform, pieces are crafted using editing tools, hand editing, hand placing over 300-800 pieces per work. My process is very tedious, while lends endless possibility for artistic play and expansion.

My work does not offer conclusions. It creates tension through visual language that is layered, symbolic, and often confrontational.

Lady Nakamoto is both mask and cultural intervention.

Artistically, I am inspired by my athletic career as a former X-games and world cup competitor in skiing and snowboarding, and by my career working extensively with the human form. Currently, I live and work in Anchorage, Alaska, where I am in private practice as a Rolfer (Structural Integration).
